FRIDAY MORNING, JULY 8, 1859.

ENGLISH CELEBRITIES.

Dr. Maddyn has lately published a volume in England full of his recollections of the great men of that stubborn race. In a few graphic sentences he describes a day with Charles James Fox, the Demosthenes of England. He introduces us to the great orator statesman at noon, when he was "lounging over a late breakfast," sipping his chocolate and amusing himself with the latest and most piquant Parisian gossip. He is surrounded with books and papers "as miscellaneous as his acquaintances." A stray volume of Tacitus is beside the Italian opera; the new Racing Calendar is carelessly tossed over his old Eton copy of Thucydides. Everything about the man, in fact, indicates the mingled life of business and dissipation, of study and frivolity, into which he plunged with passionate energy. Friends come in, and with them the orator saunters to his club. There ail flock round him, charmed with his wit and wisdom, and the Prince of Wales, takes him aside for a confidential chat. A ride in the Park follows, when the chariot of the Duchess of Devonshire is reached, and with the loveliest of reigning beauties Fox holds long and pleasant converse .-He dines with Mrs. Armistead, who should long before have borne the name she afterwards adorned, that of 'Mrs. Fox." The dinner is a brief repast, for the presence of the Whig leader is required in the House .-He has to answer Pitt on some great question, and though he rises and speaks at first in an awkward and hesitating manner, yet in a few minutes he electrifies his audience, and finishes amid thunders of applause. Then comes the sad conclusion of the hitherto glo-statesmen and orators, the kind-bearted, genial Daniel Webster, there were many points in common between him and Fox. Our excellent friend, Charles Stetson, could make a very pleasant book out of his experiences of the great expounder. Maddyn gives us an anecdote of Lord Brougham, which, true or not, is equally amusing. It is only another instance of what a thing of chance is the government of the world. The merchants of Paris express-where he remains long after the summer morning has dawned. How humiliating the thought that such stupendous genius could sink so low, and that the mighty orator of the evening should "stagger home to his lodgings a ruined gambler?" With all reverence for that greatest of our American ed the true philosophy of happiness when by they begged Neckar, the French minister, to let them alone. A poet has said-Of governments it is confessed, That which is best administered is best, which is pure nonsense, and very like some of the editorials of our public journals, since Austrian despotism, if well laid on, comes under the category. All government is a restraint upon human action and impulse; and it would be as reasonable to say that prussic acid, if well administered, is good physic. But now to Lord Brougham. One day, as Brougham was leaving the House of Lords, he met a friend who was proudly escorting two very handsome young ladies. "Ah! Brougham," was his greeting, "I am sorry you are leaving, because my fair young friends had made up their minds to hear you address the House." "Then," retorted Brougham, casting an eye of admiration upon his expected audience, "they shall not be disappointed;" and forthwith he returned into his accustomed place among the peers, whilst the ladies were escorted to the lodide of Potassium, best Cod Liver Oil on draught; ery. Lord Melbourne was then in office, just received and for sale by and when the first pause in the proceedings occurried, up jumps Brougham with a question upon some intricate matter of foreign policy. The poor premier smiles amiably but hopelessly; he is not acquainted with the facts; no notice has been given him of the question; he is very sorry, but must inquire for information. This was all that Brougham required. Once more he rises, but this time with that terrible frown upon his brow and that rugged voice with which he knew so well how to crush an opponent. A philippic against the incapacity of the min-ister, the negligence with which public affairs were conducted, the shameful supineness and indifference manifested by the advisers of the queen, was poured forth of which this man alone was capable.-Lord Melbourne cowered in his seat; the rumors of this great speech brought loungers from the Commons to listen to what seemed the deathblow of the ministry; Queen Victoria herself heard what was going on, and trembled for her amiable minister. A leading article appeared in the next morning's Times, treating the speech as something of the last importance; and it was only made after all to please a pair pretty women in the gallery who took it as they would any other tribute of homage to their beauty—a bouquet, a box at the opera, a whitebait dinner, or a new bon-

with all the rough, strong, rapid eloquence

Dr. Maddyn does not seem to have anything pleasant to say about Sir Robert Peel, one of the most repulsive, cold-blooded machines that ever wore flesh about him. Cobbett hit him to a nicety when he said "he had a ball of cotton where his heart ought to be," and that "he had no more soul than a spinning-jenny's;" and Disraeli was equally happy in likening him to a roguish lad, who found the Whigs bathing one day, and stole their clothes—alluding to his introducing the very measures he had resisted all his life. We give two specimens of the great bread-cheapener's

One day, Sir Robert Pee! was riding, near Birmingham, in company with one of the leading professional celebrities of London, then on a visit with him at Drayton Manor. They passed a new and handsome villa, which Sir Robert Peel pointed out as belonging to one of the chief professional men in Birming-

"He is," said Sir Robert's companion, "one of the oldest frends I have in the world, and it is nearly twenty years since I have taken him by the hand, although I often correspond

"Oh!" said Sir Robert Peel, "I'll drive you up there with pleasure," and the coachman was ordered to drive to the villa.

"And you must come in with me, Sir Robert," said his companion; "my old friend will I am sure, be proud of seeing me with the prime minister in his house. Sir Robert consented to go in.

The greeting between the two old friends was cordial and joyous. The family, also, at first felt much pleasure at receiving Sir Robert Peel. The honors of the house were performed with grace and hospitality. A choice luncheon, admirably served, was immediately set forth, and the prime minister sat down to the table. From the time that Sir Robert Peel entered that villa to his leaving it, he never opened his lips nor joined in the conversation!

"I would not have minded it as far as myself was concerned," said the eldest son of the gentleman who owned the villa, "but my father is one of the most respectable professional men in England, and in his way just as respectable a man as Sir Robert Peel's father, and I bitterly felt for the affront

Yet Sir Robert Peel meant no affront. was simply the fault of his manners, which at times were most ungracious. But while leading the House under the Wellington cabinet, Sir Robert's manners were peculiarly stilted and repellant. At ported the government. He was a contrac-tor and "capitalist," and was the owner of establishments which brought him much under the public eye. He sat on the ministerial back benches, and voted steadily as the whipper-in wished; and votes were of consequence to the Wellington cabinet, shaken as it was by the events 1829. One evening in 1830, this commercial M. P. was going down to the House about seven o'clock, and, crossing Palace-yard he saw Sir Robert Peel walking by himself. The contractor stood still, and just as Sir Robert was passing, in a moment of indiscreet familiarity the gov- Pure Ammonia.... ernment supporter had the audacity to say-

"Is the House up, Sir Robert?" Those who were present, and who saw the expression of Sir Robert Peel's face can never forget it. He started with as much ama zement as Bumble, when Oliver Twist asked for "more." He gave the contractor an icy gaze of freezing scorn, and did not bestow upon him even a monosyllable!

SOMBRERO GUANO. N calling the attention of the public to this valunble and recently discovered deposit of this fertilizing article, we will merely state, that like all other phosphatic GUANOS, its most valuable constituent is phosphoric acid, or bone phosphate of lime; and that its mercantile value, as compared with other GUANOS of its kind, may be easily determined by the amount of phosphoric acid or bone phosphate of line it contains. In order, therefore, to give the public a thorough knewledge of what SOMBRERO GUANO does contain, we beg to refer to the following list of eminent chemists in GARS. ferent cargoes, from average samples taken by examination of our stock, as we will sell as low as themselves from the cargoes just as they arrive from the island, without drying or selection of specimens for analyzation.
